CAN LIVE IN THE AIR.

MR. BURGWYN SUGGESTS AN ADDI-TIONAL USE FOR THE VIADUCT.

Soon if the City will Give the Franchise, The chances of the Broad-street viaduct being built in the near future are much better than most people think. There is no doubt that the structure will be crected within a very few years, and it is possible that twelve months hence there will be a level walkway from Virginia Reports of the value of $5 each the East to the West ends. careful consideration and the only obstacle seems to be the lack of funds that an well be spared from her treasury for the needed improvement. The scheme meets with almost universal endorsement and the Church-Hill people are clamorous for the bridge, which they think would greatly enhance the value of property in the East End.

Should the city decide that her financial condition is not such as to admit of this outlay, the Council would only have to grant the franchise to insure the establishment of the viaduct.

The DISPATOR is in receipt of positive street. information that . private corporation has been looking into the matter, and if certain concessions, among them the right to use the street and to charge toll, will be put up in two or three years at the outside, and probably in a much potential of the put up in two or three years at charged with stealing a sewing-machine, valued at $40, the property of his large.

Knowing that Mr. C. P. E. Burgwyn, one of the best-known engineers in Lichmond, has had large experience in Mr. Burgwyn said he had given the subject much thought and had done thirty days in jail. some little figuring on it. He was of opinion that aniron viaduct with wooden the roadway could be put up for an ount somewhere between $85,000 and Such a viaduct would have a iway of twenty-one feet and a fivefoot walkway on either side for foot passengers. This would make its entire width thirty-one feet, just one foot less than the Free bridge. His idea is to ren it from Twelfth and Broad to Twenfourth street, which would make it nearly a dead-level.

HOW SUPPORTED,

It would only be necessary, explained Mr. Burgwyn, to have the viaduct sup-ported by single iron columns 100 feet apart except in the middle, where the extreme height would require two. The structure, according to Mr. Burgwyn's alea, would consist of a continuation of centi-levers, each of which would be one hundred feet near length. This bridge would be about 3,000 feet long, and at the highest point—the Chesapeake and Ohio depot-it would be H6 feet above the street level. As a curious fact, Mr. Burgwyn stated that leaving out the discomfort and difficulty of ascending and descending the hills not more than fif-teen or twenty feet in distance would be saved by the change of grade.

the structure would not comply, contin-ned the engineer, with the usual acceptbome of that term. They would be neither round nor square, but flat. That is, they would be built of iron plates fastened together with rivets and angle bars. They would have much the appearance of iron-lattice work. At the pearance of iron-lattice work. At the top they will branch out on both sides like a letter T. No abuttments will be used, but these iron columns will be an-chored to masonry imbedded below the level of the street. This will make it simply impossible for the bridge to collapse or blow over. It would also make it much stronger than a railroad bridge, which is set on top of the stone abutments and pillars.

tion with a viaduct, the engineer remarked, had been overlooked. That is that booths for commercial purposes can be built or bracketed out on either side. He remembered seeing while in Florence two magnificent picture galhad ever seen. Projecting out on both means with much more sides were little booths for the sale of wagons, which are now jewelry, trinkets, and catables of various alley in rear of the building. All of them did a flourishing places in the city.

A residence on a viaduet would not be the worst thing in the world. There would be no danger of dampness. Elec-tric lights, water connections, and sewerage could be provided for, street-cars would be always on hand, and provisions could be had near by if desired. If any breeze was blowing in summer it would be a good place to catch it. The rent of these booths alone would more than pay

This plan was also adopted on the immense Hollorn viaduct in London and the Bialto bridge in Venice.

NOT SO VERY HIGH. When questioned as to the comparative height of the bridge, Mr. Burgwyn said it was not excessively high, and could be built just as strongly as one not cently constructed by one of the newer railroads in Pennsylvania is 300 feet

The great safety of the proposed Broad-street structure would lie in the fact that all of the iron-work would be bolted to masonry laid in the ground. It would be simply impossible to move it. Horses, street-cars, and heavy loads could pass over as quickly as they WELLS HAD THE BOOKS.
